Richard Lewis

Richard Lewis is the senior research editor and writer at the UI. He fills a new position, created by the vice presidents of Strategic Communications and Research and Economic Development. He directs research communications for the university, including story coverage. His charge is to elevate the UI's research profile locally, nationally and internationally.

Richard comes from Brown University, where he covered the physical sciences and led strategic communications for major institutional initiatives. Before that, he was a print journalist for more than a dozen years, covering science and health for The Associated Press, Reuters, the Boston Globe, MIT Technology Review and other outlets. He also started an English-language newspaper in Slovakia, which is now in its 18th year of operation.

Richard holds an undergraduate degree from Duke University and a master's degree in science journalism from Columbia University.
